Dickinson's Writing

After leaving college, Dickinson wrote prolifically on anything she could find – paper from the stationer's, envelopes, scraps of wrapping paper, and even on the back of a chocolate wrapper.

In 1858, Dickinson started reviewing poems she had written previously and began making clean copies of her work, assembling manuscript books called fascicles.

In 1995, the daguerreotype below was discovered, an alleged to be Dickinson (left) with her friend Kate Scott Turner. It has not yet been authenticated.

Emily Dickinson Artifacts

The Amherst College Archives has a lock of hair that Dickinson sent in a letter to her friend: “I shall never give you anything again that will be half so full of sunshine as this wee lock of hair.”

Are you surprised by the hair color? Does it match what you’ve learned about Dickinson thus far?

Emily Dickinson Artifacts

In her later years, Dickinson allegedly began wearing all white, including this dress (a reproduction on display at the Emily Dickinson Museum).

What inferences do you make about the dress? What symbolism is there in wearing white? What type of dress is this? Is it to be worn in private? Public? How do you know?

Dickinson died on May 15, 1886 aged 55. The cause of death was listed as Bright's Disease, known as kidney failure

Publishing Dickinson's poems

- During her lifetime, Dickinson published only 10 poems, all of them anonymously.
- She wrote almost 1800 poems, which were discovered after her death.
- Her sister found and published the poems (with help from her brother's mistress), but made numerous edits.

Dickinson's Poetic Style

- Emily Dickinson's poetry is often in what is called common meter:
  - A line of four metrical feet followed by a line of three metrical feet.
  - A foot is composed of two syllables, so using common meter would mean having a line of eight syllables followed by a line of six syllables.
    - iambic tetrameter
    - iambic trimeter
  - An iamb means the emphasis is placed on the second syllable of the metric foot

Common Meter

Here are some lines written how most poets would write:

Ashes tell us that there has been a fire
So please respect the grey remains left here

Dickinson writes:

Ashes denote that fire was –
Revere the grayest pile – [F1063]

What differences do you notice between the two types?

A black silhouette sculpture of Emily Dickinson is the central focus, seated on a large, light-colored rock. She is depicted in profile, facing left, with her right hand raised in a gesture. The sculpture is set against a backdrop of a vibrant green lawn and dense foliage, including trees and bushes. The overall scene is peaceful and natural.

I think that Earth feels so
To folks in Heaven – now –

The Dickinson Dash

In addition to challenging the meter of traditional English poetry, Dickinson also challenges the rules when it comes to punctuation. Instead of only using the obvious punctuation marks we're used to, she frequently uses the dash.

A dash is a horizontal stroke in writing or printing to mark a pause or break in sense, or to represent omitted letters or words

A Bird came down the Walk –
He did not know I saw –

[F359]

The Dickinson Dash

Some literary critics claim the purpose of the dash is to:

- Break up expected meanings
- Makes the reader work to decode the meaning of her poems
- Take the place of up to eight words
- Can account for a change in mood
- Are a form of rebellion
- Do not communicate closure

Slant Rhyme

Dickinson employed a lot of what is known as slant rhyme (or sometimes half rhyme).

→ Slant rhyme, as defined by literary critic Helen Vendler, is: "relation between words in which the final consonant syllables agree but the vowels that precede them differ"

Hope" is the thing with feathers—
That perches in the soul—
And sings the tune without the words—
And never stops—at all—

[F314]

Slant Rhyme Reasons

Critics suggest that slant rhyme could be used for the following purposes:

- Prevent a conclusive interpretation
- Call into question an understanding that might be too simplistic
- Avoid creating a sing-song effect
- Create a sudden contrast
- Rebellion from the norm

Capitalization

Dickinson used unconventional capitalization, often capitalizing words in the middle of a line, not just those at the beginning. The reasons for this are not exactly clear.

Possible reasons, suggested by critics:

- German, a language Dickinson knew, typically capitalizes nouns
- To retain and give additional emphasis on key words
- Just her handwriting?

Poetic inspiration

A vibrant garden scene featuring a variety of plants. In the foreground, there are several tall lilies with bright pink and yellow flowers. To the right, there are hostas with large, heart-shaped leaves and small purple flowers. The garden is set against a backdrop of a green lawn and dense foliage.

These gardens behind her house served as inspiration for her poetry, as many of her poems deal with the natural world!

Poetic Themes

There are many recurring themes and images in Emily Dickinson's poetry. Among them:

- Death
- The natural world
- God and religion
- The afterlife
- The possibilities of the soul
- Spiritual growth
- And yes, there are a few poems that read like steamy love poems (but not many)

What's up with the titles?

Dickinson never gave any of her poems titles. Therefore, most of her poems are referred to by their first line.

You will also see poems referred to by a number, which indicates the editor (Franklin) and the order in which Dickinson wrote the poems (based on his research of her manuscripts).

For example: [F112] or “Success is counted sweetest”
